Annie's Mailbox

Dear Annie: My father-in-law "Ron" is having an affair. At first I was not sure, but now I have proof, and my husband has seen his father with this woman, as well. Even my in-laws have told us that they only coexist with one another. I am not sure if my husband's mother knows of the affair. She might.

Since we saw my father-in-law with this woman, things have not been the same between him and my husband. My mother-in-law is not the same, either. One minute she is fine and the next she is not.

We will be leaving soon for a joint family vacation and I am not sure I want to be there. I don't even want to bring my children to their home to visit. My father-in-law has cheated before. I think my mother-in-law should divorce him and my husband agrees. He said his parents never seemed compatible when he was growing up. It seemed as though they were forced to be together because of his sister and him.

I want to tell my mother-in-law and give her my evidence. My husband says to leave it alone. He says he needs time. But I feel his mother needs to know now, the sooner the better. I don't want to be the one who knew all about his affair and did nothing. – I am Hurting, Too

Dear Hurting: This is truly not your business, and forcing your mother-in-law to confront her husband's behavior (of which she is undoubtedly aware) may not be in her best interest. Sometimes, a spouse chooses to ignore evidence in order to maintain the status quo. It is not up to you to decide whether a divorce is better for her. What you can do, however, is tell your father-in-law what you know. Anyone who cheats is exposing a spouse to sexually transmitted diseases, and this is something the spouse should know.

Dear Annie: I live in a retirement community. You would think a great many residents would have either spent time in the service or know someone who has.

It is so difficult for me to drive through the streets and see only a few homes with flags out on Memorial Day or Flag Day. You can buy flags at the dollar store, for heaven's sake. When I think of all the young women and men who have sacrificed so much for our country, it is hard to understand.

I hope people get this message, and when July Fourth comes around, we will see flags at every home. Thank you. – J.

Dear J.: What an excellent idea. Homes used to come with flag holders attached near a door or window so people could hang large flags on poles for these occasions. But it is certainly easy enough to pick up a small flag on a stick and put it on your lawn or by the curb. It doesn't matter if you are "red state" or "blue state." We all love our country and appreciate our freedoms. If you don't own a flag, please get one. And if you have one, please display it properly on these national holidays.

Dear Annie: I used to be one of those people who, when I heard that someone was ill or injured, would say, "If I can do anything to help, please call me." I meant it with all of my heart, but of course, no one ever called, so I wrongfully assumed they were OK. Then disaster struck our home. My husband fell down some steps and suddenly was a quadriplegic. Not only did it forever change our lives, it also made me realize that even though I needed help, I was hesitant to reach out. So here is my advice to those who really want to be of assistance but don't know how:

1. If it's the season to do something around your house (mow the grass or clean the gutters), your friend will need to do the same thing. If your snow needs shoveling, so does hers. If your leaves need raking, so do hers. Don't ask. Call and say, "I have an extra hour. I'm going to run over and rake your leaves," and don't take no for an answer. My pride kept me from asking, but I would gladly have accepted help from someone who insisted.

2. Don't make promises you don't intend to keep. We had a neighbor who told us on four separate occasions that he would come by to fix a broken door but didn't show up.

3. Cook something. We can no longer afford to go out to dinner, nor can we justify the expense of the special van needed to transport my husband to a restaurant. I am so tired of eating nothing but my own cooking. If you make an extra amount of anything, your friend would probably appreciate your sharing. People tend to bring food for the first couple of weeks, but now, months later, a meal would be so wonderful, and I would be so grateful. Anything I don't have to cook tastes delicious.

4. If your friend isn't "tool educated" or "computer literate" and you are, you could be a huge help. I have several things that need fixing with a power drill and I'm not good at it and don't have the time to devote to practicing. Right now, I'm building a sidewalk to our patio. It would be great if someone called to say, "I have two free hours. What do you need help with?" One neighbor came by to remove our storm doors when it occurred to him that I couldn't do that myself. I could have kissed him.

5. Call to say you are coming over to visit. We both feel so isolated. I would love for people to stop by so I have someone to talk to and he could have a friend watch a baseball game with him. People come when we specifically invite them, but they never call to suggest coming over. I get it. Before, I didn't know what we'd talk about. But the truth is, I wouldn't care if we talked about the weather. I want to hear how "real" people live, not just rehash what our life has become. – Exhausted After 10 Months

Dear Exhausted: Your suggestions are excellent. Most people want to help, but they don't know how to do it. And they don't want to impose by insisting on cutting the grass, dropping off a meal or asking to stop by for a visit. We hope they will take your words to heart.
